

UNDERSTANDING TODAY'S CRISIS

Estimates for extinction rates today are often based on data from the International Union for Conservation of Nature's (IUCN) Red List, which compiles the conservation status of threatened species. Yet the organization has assessed only a fraction of known species—themselves only a fraction of the total number of species on Earth. And even among assessed species (data shown below), many are considered data-deficient.

